GLENDAL, ARIZ. — Malcolm Butler went from the losing end of an all-time great Super Bowl highlight to a winning one within the span of 30 seconds Sunday night.

And in the end, the New England Patriots became Super Bowl XLIX champions for the fourth time since 2001 with a 28-24 win over the Seattle Seahawks.

Butler could do nothing to stop Jermaine Kearse's eye-popping, acrobatic, fall-down 33-yard reception with a minute remaining as Seattle pushed to the 1-yard line as New England clung to a three-point lead.

But when Russell Wilson fired a second-and-goal pass, it was Butler who picked off the Seattle quarterback to seal the New England win.

Brady and the Patriots orchestrated a comeback for the ages.

Trailing 24-14 at the outset of the fourth quarter, the Patriots methodically chipped away at their largest Super Bowl deficit in the last 14 years.

Julian Edelman had two 21-yard receptions in the Patriots' first drive of the fourth quarter and Brady hit Danny Amendola for a 5-yard score midway through the fourth to pull New England within 24-21.

The score was Brady's 12th Super Bowl touchdown pass, surpassing Hall of Famer Joe Montana and making him the all-time leader in the category.
